treatment plan for infidelity pdf: Implications of Infidelity D. Elliott Kronenfeld, 2021 Therapy for infidelity recovery runs the risk of missing important clinical implications of grief. This qualitative study investigated questions of infidelity recovery from interviews with 15 cisgender heterosexual men to assess their understanding of disenfranchised grief and any therapeutic interventions related to it. Disenfranchised grief is grief that cannot be spoken or is generally understood to be unsupported or unsupportable by others. The main research question was the following: Do cisgender men with a woman partner experience disenfranchised grief in therapy after committing infidelity? I used 5 sub-research questions to focus the study: (a) Does the man experience disenfranchised grief during the recovery process? (b) Does a therapist identify the grief experienced by the man who committed the infidelity? (c) If identified, how is such grief addressed in therapy? (d) Did the man find any relief from the grief because of the therapy process? (e) What, if anything, did the man learn about himself after committing infidelity and participating in therapy? The analytic methodology used a framework of hegemonic masculinity theory and social exchange theory and tools of discourse analysis to ascertain what the lived experience was during the recovery process for the men who committed one or more acts of infidelity. It was found that disenfranchised grief was experienced by all men in the study, and the relationship they had with their clinician determined how well they processed the grief through the lens of their own masculinity and relationship with their partner. Recommendations for new education and training for mental health clinicians and other providers to assist assessments for disenfranchised grief, creating meaningful treatment plans and successfully engaging men in the treatment process, are provided. .
