On arriving there, lie was liberated through the instrumentality of his brothers.--(Polysen. vi. 49; Arrian. vii. 23, 24.) On the death of Alexander, the East became a field of conten-322 EC. tion for his successors. The Greek cities of Asia were nominally free, but Antigonus had put garrisons in many of them.--(Diod. Sic. xviii.) Antigonus had obtained possession of Ephesus by means of K02. factions within the city; but no sooner did Lysimachus commence the siege, than the inhabitants, seized with terror, opened their gates. On entering the city, he gave the Ephesians their liberty, but demolished the democracy, and instituted an oligarchy. He then burnt all the vessels in their harbour, to prevent their being used on any future occasion by the enemy, who were masters of the sea. Demetrius arrived shortly after, and encamped under the walls, and the inhabitants were thus compelled to submit themselves anew to Antigonus, the garrison being granted a capitulation, and the original government re-established. It was probably on this occasion that Lysimachus attempted to regain possession of the city through treachery, in the following manner: --Demetrius having sailed on an expedition to Caria, left Diodorus, the captain of his guards, in charge of Ephesus, which he engaged to betray to Lysimachus for fifty talents. Demetrius hearing of the treachery.contemplated, and fearing to attack the city openly, steered directly to Ephesus with a few small vessels. On entering the port, he instructed Nicanor, his captain, to give out that he had received orders from Demetrius.
