Rawson, 2007-04-01 Through a true communion with God, argues the author, it is possible to treat any and all problems-from loneliness to envy to gray hair and even bad investments. But the prayer that Rawson speaks of is based not upon supplication to an omnipotent being who may or may not be listening, but on a simple process of denial and affirmation. Using an exhaustive list of examples, Rawson shows how to first deny the problem, then affirm what he calls the absolute good. It is only by dwelling on God's perfect world that one can find true healing. This is essential reading to the faithful, and a work of genuine curiosity to everyone else. Written during a period marked by the devastating impacts of World War I, this collection encapsulates the zeitgeist of early 20th-century poetry, employing vibrant imagery and innovative meter. Sorley's work presents a poignant juxtaposition of nature's beauty against the backdrop of human conflict, reflecting his personal struggles and insights gathered from his brief life and experiences as a soldier. Charles Hamilton Sorley, a promising poet born in 1895, was deeply influenced by his education at Oxford and by the literary milieu of his time, particularly the works of a generation grappling with the horrors of war. His poignant voice, though tragically cut short by his death in 1915 at the Battle of Loos, resonates through this collection, marking him as a significant figure in British war poetry. Sorley's examinations of existence and mortality are informed by both his intellectual pursuits and the lived experiences of a young man confronted with the brutality of his contemporaries.
