Housman, Richard Hughes, the Powys Brothers and his uncle Robert Graves, has now turned the spotlight on his own life and times: primarily because he wishes to give a true account of what it was like being brought up in those far-off and very different days of the 1940s and 1950s. At the start of Richard's story, we are living in the shadow of the Second World War. Rationing still exists. Traditional patriarchal families are the norm, with most women staying at home to look after their children. England is a largely white, largely Christian and highly deferential society. There is no Internet and no such thing as a smartphone; and children are reading many of the same books and being brought up in much the same way as their late-nineteenth-century predecessors, although the wireless now brings them Children's Hour. The British Empire still exists: King George VI remains Emperor of India; but a Labour Government is coming to power and great social changes lie immediately ahead.

Members of the powerful elite may have conspired to procure FAA airworthiness approval of the unsafe plane that killed more than three hundred people, but they are not investigated by the Department of Justice. A vigilante trial, arranged by those seeking retribution, brings them to account. This fictional account is linked to fact via the air disasters that actually occurred at the same geographical locations. First-hand knowledge of activities that can occur in a plane maker's workplace guides the fictional development of the story. A related episode of the television series 'Air Disasters' entitled 'Grounded' provides a lively adjunct to this book and creates food for thought about the degree of transparency being provided by news media.
