History of United Kingdom Military Medals

The tradition of awarding medals in the UK dates back centuries, evolving significantly over time to reflect changing military practices and societal values. By the 19th century, the British military formalized medal regulations, creating standardized awards for various campaigns and service.

The Crimean War (1853–1856) marked one of the first widespread uses of medals to recognize wartime service. Subsequently, medals like the Victoria Cross, established in 1856, became legendary symbols of bravery. Notable recipients include:

- Lieutenant William Hall, recognized for bravery during the Indian Mutiny.
- Captain Noel Chavasse, awarded twice for acts of heroism during World War I.

Distinguished Service Order (DSO)

Established in 1886, the DSO recognizes distinguished leadership and gallantry in combat, primarily awarded to officers. It is often awarded for leadership during major battles and campaigns.

The awarding process involves rigorous verification of acts of bravery or service. Recommendations are submitted through commanding officers, reviewed by medal committees, and approved by the monarch or the Ministry of Defence.

Wearing medals:
