His parents were vaudeville performers, and he quickly developed an affinity for physical comedy and stunts. In the early 1910s, Keaton began performing in vaudeville acts, often incorporating slapstick and acrobatic routines. His distinctive deadpan expression and daring stunts earned him recognition. By the 1920s, Keaton was establishing himself as a major silent film comedian, rivaling contemporaries like Charlie Chaplin and Harold Lloyd, but with a unique approach that emphasized realism and technical innovation.

The General: Context and Production

Historical and Cultural Background

The General is set during the American Civil War, a period rich with drama and heroism. Released in 1926, the film arrived at a time when Hollywood was experimenting with feature-length storytelling. The Civil War setting provided a backdrop for action, heroism, and romance, resonating with American audiences of the time.

The film was inspired by the real-life story of the Andrews Raid and the Great Locomotive Chase of 1862, involving Union soldiers stealing a Confederate train. Keaton's film takes creative liberties but captures the spirit of daring and adventure associated with that event.

The Making of The General

Directed by Buster Keaton and Clyde Bruckman, The General was produced by Joseph M. Schenck's distribution company. Keaton was deeply involved in every aspect of production, including writing, directing, and performing stunts.
