Wilhovsky, 2003 Under the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act of 1997, teachers are required to notify parents of their child's progress towards their IEP goals. The process by which this requirement is carried out varies from school to school and teacher to teacher. This paper outlines a study aimed at determining the most effective way to communicate, in writing, student progress to parents. This study involves developing a new IEP progress report form to replace the existing form currently used in a high school in the Oceanside Unified School District. The progress report form will be developed based on input from parents and teachers through interviews and a survey. Positive methods of communication and suggestions for developing effective relationships between teachers and parents are also discussed in this paper. Increasing communication between teachers and parents helps to promote parental involvement and influences how the parents perceive and interact with the IEP team.

iep progress report examples pdf: An Examination of the Alignment Between Individualized Education Program (IEP) Goals and IEP Progress Reports Brian Drake, 2020 Although special education documents of public school districts are often scrutinized in litigation involving the progress of students with disabilities, scant research exists about effective and compliant methods for reporting progress toward IEP goals. This study examined the extent to which IEP progress reports align to the IEP goals they intended to measure. One hundred systematically selected IEP goals and corresponding progress reports from a suburban public school district in southern Ohio were analyzed using a researcher-created rubric; the collected data were analyzed using descriptive statistics. The defined behavior, performance criteria, and overall alignment of each goal was examined by how well progress was reflected in the goal's progress report during the span of the IEP year. Eight percent of the IEP goal progress reports analyzed earned the full points possible in the area of defined behavior, fourteen percent in the area of performance criteria, and three percent earned the full points possible overall. The implications of these low alignment rates for public education stakeholders are discussed.
